To Meet Again. To meet again! Her heart is stayed On this strong hope, -though farewell said Has whelmed her happy life in wee, -As flits the bird o'er waves that flow Where late her happy nest was made. For him, too, life seems all to fade; Yet fares he forward undismayed, Locking to this one end below,-To meet again !

Day follows day; the slow years grow: What had they said, could they but know How all apart their lives were laid? With what a woe had life been weighed, When each to each they whispered low .-

To meet again! F. W. Bourdillon, in Int'l Review for June

WHAT THE BUSY BEES DID .- Mr. Matthew McPherson, residing a few miles below town, has a number of stands of bees in the yard surrounding his house, and last Friday turned a couple of colts in the yard to graze. In browsing around, they overturned a hive; irstantly, the honey making workers assailed the juvenile horse-flesh, and set them frantic with their stings. Mr. McPherson's wife ran to their relief, when the infuriated bees swarmed about her head and shoulders, until they had to be brushed off with shoulders, until they had to be brushed off with a broom,—stinging for most fearfully, and almost fatally. Her physician, Dr. Most, says that when he reached her, her head and nock were so thickly studded with the stings, that he could not find a spot for the end of his finger without encountering them. The head and face of the unfortunate lady were terribly swollen, and for several hours she was deathly sick. By the tiracly administration of proper remedies, however, she was relieved and is now almost entirely well.

however, she was relieved and is now almost entirely well.

One of the colts, the innocent author of the mischief, was so seriously stung that he died the same night.—Loudon Mirror.
